The Story Of The Jackal And The Sanyasi

In a solitary matha, there resided a Sanyasi named Dev Sharma. People often visited him and offered finely woven garments, which he sold to amass great wealth. Due to his renowned virtue, he became mistrustful of everyone, keeping his treasure purse tightly secured under his armpit day and night. At the same time, "getting money is an arduous task, and guarding it is even more of a trial. Coming and going, money causes trouble, damn this wretched source of worry!"

A cunning scoundrel named Ahadibhuti observed the Sanyasi's behavior and noticed how he kept the purse close to him. Determined to rob him, Ahadibhuti devised a plan to charm the Sanyasi with flattering words and pose as his disciple. He intended to gain the Sanyasi's confidence until the opportune moment to seize the treasure. As the saying goes, "A man who has no dearer doesn't deprive others of their rights." Ahadibhuti knew that his lack of passion and subtle speech would help him deceive the Sanyasi.

With a resolute mind, Ahadibhuti approached Dev Sharma and showed utmost reverence, bowing down before him, and greeted him with the words, "Om Namah Shivaya!" He presented himself as a humble seeker and expressed the fleeting nature of life, comparing it to a mountain stream.

Life is akin to a fire in the grass, where all its pleasures are as fleeting as autumn clouds. Relationships with friends, family, and servants are like mere dreams. Realizing the impermanence of these worldly attachments, Ahadibhuti sought guidance from Dev Sharma to navigate through the ocean of life.

Dev Sharma, impressed by Ahadibhuti's desire to renounce worldly pursuits at a young age, offered him counsel. He expressed his belief in the peace of mind that comes with a virtuous life, even when the body is still young, while the wicked suffer feeble bodies despite their youthful appearance. Touched by Dev Sharma's wisdom, Ahadibhuti humbly prostrated before him and requested to be initiated into the secrets of spiritual knowledge. Dev Sharma agreed but set a condition that Ahadibhuti would not enter the matha at night. The Sanyasi was recommended to spend nights alone without company, and both of them would adhere to this practice. Dev Sharma accepted Dev Sharma's condition and vowed to sleep in a thatched hut at the gate of the matha after his initiation.

At last, Dev Sharma performed the initiation rituals, officially making Ahadibhuti his disciple. Although Ahadibhuti served him dutifully by managing his hands and feet and attending to his needs, Dev Sharma still clung tightly to his money bag, never letting it out of his sight. As time passed, Ahadibhuti's frustration grew, feeling that Dev Sharma didn't trust him at all. He contemplated harming the Sanyasi by various means. However, an invitation from one of Dev Sharma's disciples to attend a sacred thread ceremony provided a perfect opportunity for Ahadibhuti to put his wicked plan into action.

Life is akin to a fire in the grass, where all its pleasures are as fleeting as autumn clouds. Relationships with friends, family, and servants are like mere dreams. Realizing the impermanence of these worldly attachments, Ahadibhuti sought guidance from Dev Sharma to navigate through the ocean of life.
